

Red faced no more...

Martin Klopper suffered from the dreaded red faced syndrome for many years. Like many people who's had this crimson affliction, mere creams and ointments did little to curb his ruby complexion. Martin then paid a visit to The Melrose Aesthetic Centre where he finally got the results he so desperately needed. Here is his story...

In August 2010 I was desperate; my face was red and burning. My colleagues and friends continually made comments about being in the sun. The truth was that my face looked like that most days when I experienced a bit of stress or had been in the sun or a heated room or car. I had spoken to several doctors about the problem without much success. The normal response was to try one cream or another. Most of the creams just made the problem worse. However at my wife's insistence I did see a doctor who suggested that I will need Laser treatment to sort the problem out.

A search on the internet led me to The Melrose Aesthetic Centre. Reluctantly I made a booking thinking that this would be another wild goose chase. A short but thorough examination by Dr. Gordon Cohen was conducted. He immediately put me at ease explaining what the cause was and that it could be treated with a series of laser treatments.

I was introduced to Cherie Fraser the laser specialist who would be performing my laser treatments. Her caring attitude made me realize I had made the right decision. I was absolutely delighted when my wife noticed a difference to my skin about three days after the first treatment. A week after my second treatment a friend noticed and asked what cream I was using. You can imagine my absolute delight when a colleague asked me why "I was looking so pale".

This was on a Monday, a day I used to dread. I am a keen golfer and having spent the weekend in the sun, Mondays used to be awful. Besides having a face that looked like a rooster I had a face that burnt like fire. I used to avoid going to the prize giving's or going out on a Saturday evening because of my burning face. That has all changed. My wife feels that I have regained my confidence because of the laser treatment. I don't know too much about the technology behind the laser treatment but I do know that it has made a huge difference to my life.
